Top Tips for doing business in a foreign language

Understand the importance of localisation. What makes sense in Australia may not make sense in your target country.

When it comes to contracts, be sure to present them in both native languages so all parties fully understand what is expected of them.

Use the services of an interpreter at trade shows, meetings and site visits to get the best out of your time.

Use your language service provider to ensure that you understand the cultural subtleties when you are working in a different country. This can be the difference between really forging a relationship and just doing business.

When you are placing your translated text into a brochure or some other document, make sure your desktop publisher knows about the rules of foreign languages. ONCALL offers an experienced multilingual desktop publishing service into already established brand material.

Meetings with your global partners can be affordable by using video conference interpreting. Technology has provided alternatives to flying across the world.
